An elegant mansion caught in the crossfire of the Civil War: Oaklands Historic House Museum

MURFREESBORO, Tenn.--Oaklands, the plantation home of the Maney family, is the only historic house museum in Murfreesboro, Tennessee. The story of Oaklands and the Maney family reflects a time of prosperity in the antebellum south, as well as the hardships suffered during the Civil War.

Oaklands began as a two-room brick house built between 1815 and 1820 by Dr. James Maney and his wife, Sally Hardy Murfree Maney, who migrated to this area from North Carolina. Dr. and Sally Maney added onto the house twice, once in the 1820s and again in the 1830s. After Sally's death in 1857, Dr. Maney passed management of Oaklands to his eldest son Lewis, and his wife Rachel Adeline Cannon, daughter of former Tennessee governor Newton Cannon. Lewis and Adeline added the front façade in the Italianate style by 1860, making Oaklands one of the most elegant homes in Middle Tennessee.

During the Civil War, Oaklands was the scene of a battle and a presidential visit. On July 13, 1862, Confederate cavalymen under Nathan Bedford Forrest surprised and defeated Federal forces camped on the front grounds of Oaklands as part of a raid on Union-occupied Murfreesboro. The Maney family watched the fighting from the tall windows of the mansion.

In December 1862, Jefferson Davis, President of the Confederacy, stayed at Oaklands as an honored guest of the Maneys. Davis came to Murfreesboro to visit Gen. Braxton Bragg's army camped in town and to get a better idea of the military situation in the Western Theatre. He and several of his generals dined in the parlor of Oaklands.

The Maneys, like many wealthy southern planter families, experienced economic hardship as a result of the Civil War. After the war, the Maney family sold off parts of their Oaklands property to compensate for their financial losses. After the Maney's left Oaklands in 1884, it passed through a succession of owners. After the last owner left in 1954, the mansion sat vacant and neglected for several years and was sold to the city of Murfreesboro in 1958. When the city's plans to demolish Oaklands as part of an urban renewal project became known, a group of concerned local women mobilized to save the mansion and formed the Oaklands Association in 1959. The city agreed to give the house and 1/3-acre to the Association for the purpose of establishing a museum. The house was opened to the public in 1962.

Oaklands survived the Civil War and the wrecking ball, and is one of Murfreesboro's most treasured landmarks. It was placed on the National Register of Historic Places in 1974 and welcomes thousands of visitors each year.
